Subject: : Professional Stream Reports
Topic: : cedar Run
Re: cedar Run
Author: : sundrunk
Date: : 2009/10/5 21:55:23
URL:

Quote:

> RRR wrote:
> I don't know about dynamite, although I'm sure some people might use it. When I was a young fellow, the wife and I used to spend alot of time up in the Potter Co.and Tioga Co. area and became pretty well acquainted with some of the local families up there. I won't go into detail as to the method they used so as not to give anybody any ideas, but I do know they had a technique that they used on small brookie streams which would kill every trout in a given pool or stretch of stream. The whole family would go along and all would position themselves downstream of the kill zone with nets and scoop up the dead trout as they drifted down. That's just how they got their fish when they wanted a fish fry. That was about 35 or 40 years ago but I imagine it still goes on today. Never actually saw them do it, but that's what they told me. To hear that about Cedar (or any other stream for that matter) is very trajic. I never fished Cedar or Slate and am heading up that way in a couple weeks to see the fall foliage and revisit some of the areas my wife and I used to hunt and fish. I'll still fish Cedar while I'm up there and post a report as to what I find when I get back.

You're killing me, mercy...Do you think they have any idea they're doing something wrong? Or, do you think they know perfectly well what they are doing, and they just don't care?