The trout fishing (for good fish anyway) on certain parts of the Yough has really shut down over the past few days, and we've been left scratching our heads as to what has brought this dearth of trout upon us. The morning bite has still been pretty solid, but for the rest of the day the trout have been hard to come by. Afternoon hatches have been putting a few fish on the feed, but the bugs have been sparse as well and so goes the afternoon rise.

Not a whole lot has changed in the way of river conditions: the flows and temps are still nice, and if anything, a scarcity of rain helps this river as the Casselman River is contributing very little water and the temps are staying pretty nice all the way down and through Ohiopyle. Even the cloud cover hasn't helped all that much. We're going to go ahead and blame the unstable weather since that's all we can come up with. Shoot us an email if you think of anything better.

The bass bite is still hanging tough with fish taking anything from dead drifted buggers to poppers making all kinds of commotion.

That's it for now. Lets hope the future holds something better for those searching for salmonids among the slick runs of the Y.
