Based purely on age and experience, I know I'm not more skilled than most here. I do understand that my brain can process much more information than I ever consciously realize it does. Just allow it to be reactionary. You just feel like you should set. It's a good point that a good chunk of it involves setting blindly in good looking water, but there are other, seemingly undetectable things going on too. Perhaps the line slows for a split second, or you catch a flash out of the corner of your eye. Just allow yourself to react. It's very primal and also very relaxing.

I'd be lying if I told you I knew exactly what I was looking for, honestly. It's not magic... just too complex for me to categorize.

Perhaps the fact that I bait fished since I could walk helps (I almost always fished weightless natural drifts). Once I started fly fishing a few years ago, nymphing felt very natural.
