His conservation angle is a ruse, it's just PR. He has a business and is successful at it. He buys land and charges large amounts of money to access it.

If it were about conservation, he wouldn't ruin excellent wild trout fisheries by stocking them heavily and loading the stream with nitrates by feeding them pellets in the stream. If it were about conservation, there wouldn't even be a thought of making housing developments for "elegant country living."

The story of the land being taken away is development. He could have bought the land and donated it to a conservancy, or just enacted a conservation easement, preventing development and ensuring public access and he'd have been a hero.
