I think from the standpoint of what edge it gives you, keeping track of stream conditions, weather, and hatches give you more information than pure numbers of fish. It is much more important to know whether you had a good day what you caught fish on in a particular stream because if you go back then you have some information about what to use and possibly what not to use. Writing it down as you fish would be a benefit, but writing it down at the end of the day, is probably easier.

However, I thought counting the fish and keeping track of the size of fish caught from the standpoint of hows the population doing.
