Bergman wrote in trout that his preferred method to wet flies was to cast down and then across, as normal, but then he would add a little something.

On the swing, he would lift the rod or strip a little line multiple times, to make it look like the fly would be starting its ascent to the surface. His suggestion was to do this a couple times during the drift, a slight rise, then let it fall back.

He would then begin to retrieve the fly back a bit before re-casting.

I've tied a bunch of wet flies, but have had the most success on the Black Pennell and a partridge-and-peacock.
