I think both posts are correct. You asked about "fast and slow". Go small and light in the slow, big and heavy in the fast.

I can't imagine czech nymphing in frog water. I don't really fish frog water at all, actually, but if I did, I'd do what Mute suggested.

JC's post illustrates an excellent tactic in faster water.

Note that the types of presentation are the key, not the patterns. The answer to the age old "what flies" question is a combination of heavy, medium, or light weight and dark, neutral, or light color. What patterns you use to fit that paradigm is largely inconsequential. Matching hatches is a different story, but then the question should be "what's hatching" instead. The types of bugs can be studied (at the stream, in books, or online) to determine what types of water to fish. A reasonable match should suffice. Check troutnut.com for photos of the bugs.

That's how I see it, anyway. 😊
