If it's working when you need it to, I'd say you have it figured out just fine.

There may be other ways to catch 'em, but if you're satisfied with the method you've found, why bother?

IMO, you've got the presentation figured out for the situations you fish. You've arrived at the same conclusions I did when I fished similar streams more often. I couldn't find a better way to catch the pressured stockers than what you're doing.

Honestly, the best way to learn new presentations is to keep fishing different streams. Give valley another few shots this spring, and it'll teach you things about presentation. It taught me the hard way the last time I was there... but it happens. There is better water upstream of where you fished it, near the turnpike bridge.
