The carp fishing adventures that i remember most were with a buddy on the Raystown , it was sight fishing for shoreline cruisers and it was a blast. He'd pull into an eddy and we'd just sit a moment and let things quiet down and before long there would be fish moving/cruising slowly along shore and beleive me when i say , dryflies , yep dryflies , cast in front of them (a black foam ant or beetle in size 10) would almost always bring a reaction. I hesitate to use the word strike 'cause believe it or not most of the time it was a sip. They would rush up but before they took they would have a good look and most of the time they would just sip it in like a brown trout does when it's midging or like a bluegill does. When hooked they would head straight for the bottom , which at the Raystown is waaaaaay down there. It was a blast and i'd suggest anyone try it , there are inlets by the hundreds like this at the lake and each one has it's own personality but they almost all have a population of carp. Sight fishing for these must be pretty close to fishing for redfish , no offense to redfishers.
