It's really about increased foot traffic on streams that are usually without it in many cases.

For example, the spot we fished would see a marked increase in traffic if it were publicized more, to both the detriment of anglers that enjoy fishing it in relative solitude (which I think is critical to doing well there)... as well as the landowners. Add in a lack of parking that won't annoy the landowners, and you've got reason to want something kept on the relative down-low.

There's simply no reason to post about places like that, given their proximity to large populations, and a relative lack of other decent opportunities in the area. PMs or in person? No big deal. It doesn't need to be broadcast IMO. It's well protected by various conservation orgs as well, so it's not like the publicity would bring any good.

I see it as a basic etiquette issue.
