One of the things that seems to help me with fishing crowe beetle patterns that are hard to see is to really whack the fly down hard on the water , from that initial splat it makes it easier to see where your fly is and the splat gets their attention , if you lose sight of it on the drift a little twitch , just enough to move the fly a little will keep you in touch with where you're at. Another thing is that if you aren't sure where your fly is set the hook if you see a rise even if you don't think your fly is there , when in doubt strike , alot of times you end up getting them even though you thought there's no way my fly is there.
