Ya, I found that info. This was a "Rant" article in Jan/Feb 2010 American Angler. It was some guy using extreme examples and how everyone should just die, in trying to otherwise sell a valid point.

"One study found that walking across a redd once increased egg mortality by 40%, and walking across it twice in one day - think of an out-and-back path - increased mortality rates up to 83%. When it comes to improving trout habitat, dam removal is not always a feasible option, but walking around a redd or choosing to fish another area with less impact seems fatality attainable."

Study source is not cited.

afishinado, that second video of the Colorado brookies is awesome.
