

Subject: : Conservation

Topic: : HomeWaters Club- different name, same agenda

Re: HomeWaters Club- different name, same agenda

Author: : TUNA

Date: : 2011/1/7 13:13:10

URL:

The next time I encounter a DB client with a guide in my area I will film it for you Jack. I'm not trying to say they are all terrible fishermen, but SOME are. I've witnessed it myself right below the project water on Spruce. The sport had a few thousand dollars wrapped up in gear, all of it sparkling new by the way. I watched him fish for probably an hour and while he did manage to pick up one pellethead, he caught a heck of alot more trees, himself, and the guide. Like I said this is not all members/clients, but I'm going to assume that most are terrible flyfishers.

IMO anyone who is "good" at flyfishing should be able to see through the bs that DB spews. Most people that have flyfished long enough to know what they are doing are probably going to want to do things on their own, ie find spots, pick their own flies, and handle their own fish. While I'm sure some people like the idea of catching large trout that other people don't have access to, its not for everyone. On the club webpage they even advertise an instructional school. I know other outfits will teach people to flyfish, but I'm going to assume DB does it because a lot of his potential clients don't know what they are doing. Like I said above, I'm sure some of his clients do know what they are doing, but as a majority they have no clue. That is all.