I'll put in a third vote for the SPOT tracker.

They're handy little units, about the size of your fist. They can be set up for real time tracking, not just for emergency use, and they do have a distress '911' button for when things go pear shaped and you need extracted. They're quite popular with the self support bike packing crowd, where you cover a lot of ground and put yourself wayyyyyy out there. If wifey is curious or concerned about your whereabouts, she can log in and see pretty directly where you're at.

Of course, the most important safety tool is the one between your ears...
