Ya, they say you should turn your passion into a career for ultimate success, but I don't know about this. Seems turning your passion into a job would suck.

I used to love all things technology and computers.

Now I hate everything about them, and pick hobbies in which I use a computer only in the most tangential way.

Find a job that involves your passion, sure, but making a passion into a job is a surefire way to find out you hate it.

I have to disagree. Each person is an individual. Trust me, i love what i do but i could grow to hate it anyday now and if i do ill change it but ill never do something i do not enjoy doing. Making someone else money while constantly wondering if they were going to repurpose my cubicle is not my idea of a life. Those days are long gone. What if you start a guide service yourself? It would be easy to discard the idea that you would just eventually grow to hate it but you'll never know unless you try.

I have to agree with tech and computers as a source of profit. I too made that leap in college organizing my first business. It was mildly successful but i lost the love so i moved on. It's called adaptation. Not only to your market, but to yourself as well.
