You guys think this is something new? This State is criss crossed with natural gas distribution pipelines already many of which go under streams, rivers, etc. Rather have a pipeline buried well under a stream bed than any more of those ugly windmills on mountain tops.

Windmills don't leak. Just sayin'.

They have had hydraulic fluid leak issues but certainly not on the level of other energy leak potential.

I can't believe one would complain about windmills versus well pads and all the environmental impacts of same.

Yes, as someone posted in another thread...everything leaks. But there is a difference between a limited supply of anything and a limitless pipeline spill. If a windmill drains all its fluid on the ground and no one notices for a few days you know exactly how much is leaked. Let a pipeline leak for a few days and see what happens.

Its just naive to defend what is going on. If you fish or hunt or own a camp in PA, you are either hoping for the best or just ignorant to what they are doing to our state.
