I'm not surprised to hear that the TT line shoots like poop through a goose. I bought one of the original ivory TT's within a year or two of when they first came out (long ago, late 70's to early 80's maybe) and it was the best shooting line I ever owned. But I spooled it up in April and by mid-July, it was all checked, cracked and basically done for. So, I never bought another. In the interest of full disclosure, I'm tough on equipment in general and lines in particular. I seldom clean them and have a habit of walking on the coils of line at my feet.

So, there's that..

All the same, if the newer TT's have the same "shootability" and in the interim have also gained some of the durability of the old 444's (the only line I could walk on and have last more than a single season), I'll go out and buy one tomorrow. It was a sweet casting line..
