I'm glad they're reintroducing them. Hell, I live near the Swatara Creek and the name Swatara (or a close approximation) literally means "the place where we eat eels" in the Lenape language. The arteries and veins of the land that control the ebb and flow of life and connect mountain to sea have been severed for long enough. It's not a be all/end all solution, but it's a start.

On a side note, a very interesting fact about eels that I learned a few years ago still blows me away. American eels and European eels both migrate to the same stretch of the Sargasso Sea to spawn, then the offspring of the Americans go to North America and the European offspring swim to Europe. That's pretty freakin' far out, imho.
