That's great to hear, I guess we don't give the fish enough credit for their ability to survive adverse conditions. They have been around for thousands of years, surviving droughts and floods, and will continue to do so if we are wise enough to allow them.

Indeed, but that's got to be taken with a grain of salt.

Our forests were untouched old growth for thousands of years. Development and deforestation (both of which greatly contribute to temperature spikes and dewatering) are relatively recent.
