I've been reading a lot of blog posts and even Tom Rosenbauer talking about carp in his podcast series, and ALL of them say how strong carp are and how they make long runs yada yada yada. I have never caught a carp before, so my first attempts with the fly rod have been my first attempts in general. I certainly hope from here on out, I get the fighters, because this one was just plain lame. Especially with all the hype that has been created about the fish and the repeated failures on my part. I guess I just ended up with the docile one of the pond? I was curious if this can be a common occurrence with carp where some fight and some don't, that's why I posted the story.

Were your carp big? I would take a guess and say this one weighed 10-12lbs. I think that is an average fish for a pond.
