Try lowering the tip of your rod about 24" off the water holding the rod at a slight upward angle. This will create a slight belly in your fly line from the tip of your rod to the water and act as a shock absorber. It also helps if your using a medium action or a slow action rod to also take up some of the shock. Probably during a hatch you encounter more misses just because the fish are feeding actively under the surface I know this is when I would miss a lot of fish. But with the right action rod and putting that slight belly in the line will hook you more fish.
