I read a very similar story in Gray's Sporting Journal, about a kid growing up near a factory. His dad & everyone in his family worked there, and he was being raised to carry on the family drudgery. His "escape" through high school was to fish a stream that had chubs in it. One day his dad found him casting dry flies to rising chubs and they had a moment of understanding. From that point on their lives diverged. It was very introspective and touching.

I think I puked. 🤮
