Not at all. Its quite easy, as long as you don't have too long of a trailing tipper or too short of one. Additionally it makes sense to put the bigger fly first then the smaller fly. I tie the trailing dry to the eye of the leading dry. Its great for fishing larger water where multiple hatches are coming off and you can't tell for sure which fly the trout are keyed on. It is also helpful for fishing smaller dries at a distance, as you can watch the lead fly to tell how close your flies are in relation to the rise, and for emergers it acts as an indicator and goes under when they take the emergent dropper.

Give it a whirl, you'll be sure to get a tangle or two, but it is far from prohibitive. Another good tactic is using a dry with a spent wing spinner, which are often harder to see in the water anyway.
