Tried an experiment last weekend and instead of fishing a combination of nymphs I went with one fly but different sizes. In this case I went with a 10, 12 and 16 bhpt with the point being split shot. Let me explain, split shot on 6" of 7X (rather loose the shot) to a tippet ring then 12" to another ring and 16" another ring (damn I love these things). The flies were tied off with a 4" tag from each ring in order as stated above. Never brought a fish to hand on the size 10 and the 16 out fished the 12.

I began wondering if the success rate was because of the fish holding in a certain water column so I changed the positions of the flies moving the size 10 in place of the 16. Again over the next hour the 16 out fished the other two. So I'm not sure if a combination of flies is the answer but maybe size. It appears in this case that size does matter. 😊
