Yep, this is how I go about it. Except I hold the rod tip up a good bit higher, about shoulder height. The slack that doing that creates allows the fish to take the fly turn and begin to return to the bottom before they feel any pressure, the line will straighten out then you softly raise the rod and get a hook set in the corner of the mouth. (most times, nothings guaranteed) That bit of advise given to me by an Englishman that I feel really knows his stuff really increased my catch rate and lowered my had a lot of takes but did'nt hook em rate. Hope this helps.
