P.S. Poe Paddy still looks like a circus in mid May, with or without the drakes. But it's a little deceptive. Those two, very close little parking areas there both provide access to miles and miles of water. Be willing to walk, and don't let 20 or so vehicles sour you too much, think about how much water those people are spread out on.

Also, I'm not sure how new you are to this kind of fishing. But be prepared to keep late hours. You can nymph mornings. But if you're after hatches, sulphur duns start at 1 p.m. at the earliest, most often it's more like dinnertime or after. Spinners at dusk and/or beyond, you fish till well after dark, so carry a flashlight. When camped there, considering time to walk back, I often don't get back to the campsite till 11 or so.

Then you have the choice. Turn in, and nymph or hit a brookie stream in the morning? Or make a fire, make a night of it, have some fun and sleep the heck in.
