With all due respect to my attorney friends, having a law degree does not disqualify someone from being butt-ignorant about virtually every other subject under the sun.

But some people with JDs seem to think that law school has made them an expert on EVERYTHING. And all too many of them are elected officials.

Exhibit A: Senator Gene Yaw, (R- 23rd district-Pa.)

If I were to do an exhaustive list, it would scroll on and on and on. Both Republicans and Democrats. In every state in the Union. It's ironic to think that so many of them go on about the value of "education", when their own educations are so obviously stunted in so many areas, including the basics of the natural systems of the planet they're standing on.

Since the ignoramuses have a law school diploma and they've passed the bar exam, they think they're obviously so well-educated that they have nothing else to learn. But there are 9 year olds that know more about natural science subjects than most of the legislators I'm talking about.
