jack,
would a trout launch itself out of the water for an emerging insect as mentioned in the opening post?? I always associated that behavior with caddis or skittering midges/mayflies.....Im ashamed to admit this too, but i NEVER use soft hackles, perhaps i should start

I answer: YES! Trout will chase the emerging insect to the surface and often end up breaking the surface upward as a result of a vertical attack. Also, this behavior sometimes is exhibited during crane fly activities. And, yes, particularly with caddis, which tend to dart toward the surface and escape the film in short order. Then again, I have no idea what I am talking about.
