I'd hope the rafting industry in Ohio has a plan.

 Too funny. Rafting industry and plan do not fit in the same grammatical construct.

What to do? It seems like this stuff varies in intensity depending upon the watershed, and time will tell how well it does on the Yough. The bright side, if there be one, is that the blooms occur during a time when very few people fish the river, and the predictably high water in the spring will help to dislodge those blooms by the time people are actually able to get on the river. Of course that is best case. So what to do is continue to fish, and try not to spread the stuff around.
