I've always read that an up stream penetration is best most of the time but I'm spooking fish when it's low and clear. I'm finding that an across stream presentation works better and I was wondering if anyone had any advce.

I'm usually fishing small dries on an 8' leader w/ 7x tippet.

I really depends on the water, the fish and the situation, but yes, an across or downstream presentation for dries may be best at times since the fly and leader lands well above the fish, and the fish see the fly before the leader. Almost without exception, though, getting a good drift is the key.
