I think it is more of a function of ease of access than it is type of fishing gear. Where access is easiest, you will find the garbage because of increased traffic and easy fishing for people who do not want to work as hard as some of us to catch a few fish.

As a side note, I just got done cutting trees for logs and clearing streambank to allow equipment in for our next stream project. The people who are working on this project are spin fisherman and bait dunkers primarily, who just want to see a local stream improved for better angling.

If you work with the PFBC and your local conservation district, it actually is relatively easy to complete stream projects. We don't have a local TU chapter, so our watershed association is leading the work.
