Some got close but turned away for whatever reason but four times what felt or looked like a taste, I couldn't hook it. Not sure if it was my timing, my technique, or something else.

I used to have this happen to me many moons ago. Stagger, what felt like a take most likely was. What I've learned over the years is wait until the trout is on his way back down after you see it take the fly. Patience is hard to come by at that moment, because of visual. And yes I also think that trout in certain streams are a lot more educated than in others. I have had trout at valley creek follow my dries backwards for several feet. Only to turn away at the last second or take it, and really get your blood boiling. This usually occurs in slower water. Hope this helps.
