If you are talking about dries, I heard that if you're trying not to spook the fish, use around 7in of very small (7x sounds good) tippet from the end of the leader so that the fish can only see the fly and the tippet. Then you need to straighten the leader so that the line doesn't curl up next to the fly. according to another fly fisherman who told me about this, the fish can see the curled up leader and with just turn around. Also, attach the leader to the fly line using a perfectionist knot. Other then that, I stand downstream and cast upstream, and I've had a couple takes but setting the hook is frustrating.

Hoped this helped :)
