Just wanted to throw out two possibilities: 1) that whatever rainbows the PFBC caught in their survey might have been assumed to be stocked just because they weren't looking for wild reproduction in the Little J. It's not always easy to tell, especially if that's not really something they were spending time trying to ascertain. So it may not be accurate to say that they didn't net any wild ones. 2) the state was putting a lot of fingerling bows in some unusual places not long ago (Cove Creek in Bedford County comes to mind). Could some of these wild-appearing bows have been planted as fingerlings? (I am aware that the stocking of fingerling browns was recently halted)
