I like to find out which direction they are moving, put it five or six feet ahead of them, wait for them to get within about 2-3 feet and give it a twitch. I usually use sparse streamers with a brass cone head. Sinks right where you put it and gives them something they can see when you twitch it. The toughest part is not spooking them with the cast, which is why I don't put it right on top of them. This is what I do for lakes. In streams I just drift a woolybugger past them within a few feet standing downstream at about a 45 degree angle. Results may be different on different bodies of water, but I usually catch a few if they are around using these techniques. I read a lot about nymphing for them with small flies, but my streamers are usually size 2-6 and seem to work pretty well. I use 4 feet of 8-10 pound tippet with about 5-6 of 15 lb leader.
