If a stream gets named once in passing and nobody talks about it, generally it will fade away without damage. But if everyone then takes the view that since it's been named and "outed" by someone else it's now fair game for me to talk about all I want and it keeps getting brought up, that attention will result in an increase in pressure. That is a lame excuse for talking about a stream – someone else named it not me. Only when a stream is named for the first time in a glorifying stream report does it really result in an increase in fishing pressure.

Step one, don't talk about streams or sections of streams or hatches on streams, whether known or unknown, that sees little fishing pressure. The less fishing pressure, the better for the trout and the habitat and selfishly, also the better for you, so don't mention it and enjoy your peace and solitude (and you may be maintaining someone else's peace and solitude too). And outing doesn't necessarily mean naming a stream that hasn't been named or isn't known. I fish numerous streams that are known yet I fish them outside of their more popular sections or during times other than their more popular hatches and hardly see anyone else and the fishing is as good if not better than the more popular areas and times. I'd be an idiot to announce any of this on a public forum.
