Afish,

I like fishing the curved shank, wider gap hooks for many of my smaller size dry flies. Many of these hooks have an offset point. I very rarely am fishing directly upstream, so I find myself fishing a particular run from one side or the other. I try to choose a fly with an offset hook point directed toward my position so when I lift the rod tip on the take the hook point is in line with my rod. It could just be me, but I feel my percentage of fish hooked has increased since I started paying attention to this detail. Hope this makes sense and my theory may be able to be shot full of holes by some folks but it is what I was trying to explain in the earlier post.
