I have noticed sites that have real names seem to be more business and less BS.

Do any sites aside from TroutLegend actually use that model? That site is basically a niche community of people who are interested competitive FF.

Guys don't burn spots and troll on those sites simply because they don't have the internet muscles that come with a fake name.

Does hosting tournaments on streams and encouraging people to attend them count as spot-burning? That seems to be the main purpose of TroutLegend. Hosting tournaments on wild trout streams during spawning season is worse than spot burning. Having 20 anglers wade through the redds is great stewardship.

I'm sure you'd be banned pretty fast if you decided to raise (valid) points about the ethics of competitive fly fishing on TroutLegend, real name or not. That is a pretty insular community over there. At least here we can have a healthy debate about issues.
