Tom,

I agree that numbers sometimes lie, but on my "home" streams, after watching the flow rates, how fast the stream rises and lowers, etc., and fishing them when taking note of the reading, I can usually tell what the conditions will be on the stream. I agree that it is only a very rough guideline for a stream I never or rarely fish. Also many times one fisherman's too low or too high is a perfect level for another fisherman. In addition, I find less than ideal water (and weather) conditions a good time to plan a trip to a heavily fished stream since most anglers shy away from fishing under such conditions.

Stream reports have been sparse, probably for the reasons you mentioned, but it seems that anyone inquiring about a stream receives multiple posts with info about the stream.
