Fingerling trout stockings are occasionally successful in Pa streams, but usually they are not (low survival rates to adult size).

Low survival, or low residency? I'd guess that both come into play, depending on the situation. But I've always thought the latter doesn't get enough consideration.

For instance, with the later year trials on the Tully, I caught a significant number of fingerling bows around the mouth and in the Skuke itself.

I don't consider poor residency much of a "problem". That's the whole point of a wild/fingerling fishery, the fish are spread out more naturally, not just piled in the stocked areas.
