wgmiller,

Not that I disagree with your stance, I do the same thing. But the thing that irks me is, why does everyone see it as only us who must choose whether to take a risk? Somebody put those signs up, and somebody leaves them there and presumably actually enforces them. Does not that person take just as big of a risk? It is, after all, illegal to post publicly owned land, and in my view, that's a violation for each person who's been wrongfully turned away.

These declarations are very old. Older than the landowners. The landowners took the FIRST risk by posting it to begin with.
