So watching the video again, he clearly states it is not a directional change cast, and you need to line up with the line that is still on the water.

If so, you cast and drift a run, how do you then use this cast to cast to the top of the run again? do you start your pull to form your D-Lopp in the direction of the top of the run?

A friend of mine made this short video that explains this...

To simplify things, you can just flip the line upstream using the current to provide the load on the rod (water haul).

If you need to reach out further across the river, just flip the line upstream in front of you, then make your rollcast.

The important thing to remember here is to make sure the line is on the opposite side of the rod as you are.
