Yeah, that's what I thought, and that definitely makes sense. My point is that the campground would probably prefer to have the credit card information and payment of the actually renter, as opposed to keeping your payment and having the new renter pay you. This is probably safer for you too. Just in the odd event of any damage to the cabin or the need for the new renter to cancel.

I think we're essentially saying the same thing in terms of practice...just don't cancel for a week and see if anyone from the board is interested. If they are, have them PM you, and then call the campground and let them know what's up...and that you have someone from the PAFF gathering who wants to rent it. Campground cancels your payment (and hopefully waives the fee). New renter calls Campground, books cabin, and arranges for payment.
