I guess "beauty is in the eye of the beholder." I would say the Letort is unique in its pastoral setting and as a true spring creek there are things about it that are beautiful like the large cress beds but considering the mostly suburban setting it flows through these days I think it is far more about the legend and difficulty than beauty. It doesn't compare to the mountain settings some of the other well known streams in PA flow though.

I would have loved to have seen and fished this stream back in its heyday when Fox, Koch, Marinaro and others fished it almost daily during the season.

No one should feel intimidated or unworthy to fish this stream. Go for no other reason than to experience something unique and to perhaps immerse yourself a little bit in fly fishing history.

(And try to avoid wading at all costs, and go on a cloudy day, and be ready to take the skunk!)
