After you get frustrated upstream try the lower end near the mouth. I have not been out there in a few years but from what I remember the fish were easier there.

I don't think the fish are that much easier to catch as much as it is a little easier to fish. Although that has changed a little. In my opinion it is for a couple reasons. First, that area is not fished as much as the upper water. Second, it is not quite as choked as the upper water, which is the part that is changing. It seems the lower water is getting more choked with weeds and resembling the upper water more. Third, hatches and bugs on the lower water seem to be more predictable and heavier. I have always thought Sulfurs and Olives were better on the lower water. Add in that the lower water has a nice trike hatch and the meadow areas have tons of hoppers. I think this combination have made the trout in the lower water more apt to feed on the surface in comparison to the fish on the upper water which are more rooters and subsurface feeders.
