Good advice from Becker. Things are pretty wild up there and who knows what next week brings. This time of year for me it is all about conditions. We plan and end up cancelling way more trips to the Salmon than we actually go on - b/c things can get so extreme up there. If you are going regardless of weather/water then just have fun with it. Find a favorite pool that is away from the road and holds winter steel. Most of them will hold fish. Then it is just a matter of fishing different depths, weight, and flies until you get into their zone. Winter time is great for eggs and stones as usual. If you get a warmer day (over 40) you could start to see little black stones, in which case they should really turn onto anything smallish and black. Enjoy your time up there though - I do not get up enough and am jealous.
