one thing you have to take into consideration is that a smaller yak is gonna be slower. which means its gonna take more effort to paddle. the other thing which is more important is the longer the yak the better it will track in the water. a small yak will get pushed around with in the equation wind. that's why its better to go with a longer yak. this is more important for fishing the ocean and large bays. not so much ponds and lakes. 13 feet is kind the middle 10 is on the small side and they get up to 16 feet but I feel its to much of a pain to transport it. around there is no need to rush when its still freezing out.
