I agree also.

You don't need the latest and greatest but if you are hooked on flyfishing and have the means, it is not hard to justify a rod that you will use almost everytime you get out fishing.

If you keep it for 10 years before getting the itch for a new one, $80 dollars per year is not a bad investment and it might just give you a shot of confidence and pride of ownership.

Just beware of the sales pitch and cast the rods you are considering both near and far to see which one grooves with your casting style.

My experience has been that one will just seem effortless and you will know.
