mutz,

I either detach the hood, and trust that the brim is wide enough to force any drips to hit my body below the wader line. Or in really bad weather, I put the hood under the hat, which really looks weird but gets the job done.

In the winter I wear one of those little fleece headband things under the hat to cover my ears.

My problem is hunting. I don't want to put pin holes in my good leather one to attach blaze orange. I have a blaze orange felt hat, but it really sucks up water bad, and is pretty stretched out, floppy brimmed, and all around just a piece of crap. I don't like ball hats for hunting at all because we hunt in lake effect area, it snows every year, and it's falling from trees, etc., and goes down my neck. My solution has been to wear the blaze hat OVER the leather one. The leather underneath gives it decent shape. The leather still protects my head from wetness, but when it really gets waterlogged I can separate it off and wring it out. It works pretty well, but looks super ridiculous and has earned me the nickname "double hat man".

to fix your hunting problem i have a solution. my uncle has a hat like yours and uses a kids orange stripper had with the top cut off so it is like a womens tube top shirt. he slips this on and it stays on even in the briars chasing the beagles/rabbits. give this a shot and let me know...
