I've been told that clipping the adipose fin is common in experimental stockings by the PFBC. In support of the OP's comments these fish have colored up nicely and most fins and tails are in very good condition. (The one in the photo does show damage on lower edge of the tail consistent with a stocked fish). Some of them are also sporting distinctive blue par markings. Without the clipped adipose, a legitimate debate could be had about stocked vs. wild on some of these fish.
